

- Despite my timely objection and repeated efforts to obtain a prompt evidentiary hearing, a conclusive hearing had still not been held by early October.
- On October 8, 2025, chambers finally scheduled a “continuation” of the matter for October 29, 2025—nearly two months after the ex parte suspension and far beyond the 21-day hearing expectation reflected in discussions of MCR 3.207(B)(6) in Michigan appellate practice. (FindLaw Case Law)

12. October 29, 2025 – Belated evidentiary hearing.

- The evidentiary hearing on the merits of the allegations and the parenting-time suspension finally concluded on October 29, 2025—approximately ninety days after the ex parte order.
- Only at this late stage did I receive a full opportunity for sworn testimony and cross-examination. By then, the damage from prolonged separation and uncertainty was already done.

F. PPO Contempt Proceedings and Their Collateral Harm

13. Earlier show-cause hearing – Jail, job loss, and housing loss.

- At a prior PPO show-cause hearing (commonly referred to as Show Cause #4), I was jailed for alleged PPO contempt under contested circumstances, without a full opportunity to present exculpatory evidence.
- The resulting jail time caused me to lose my job and fall behind financially, which contributed to losing my housing.
- These job and housing losses were later used against me in custody and parenting-time analysis, even though they directly flowed from the court’s handling of PPO contempt, not from parental unfitness.

14. February 28, 2025 – PPO violation hearing (Counts #5 and #6).

- At the February 28, 2025 PPO violation hearing, the record reflects side-channel communication minimizing the immediate threat of jail, while in open court the judge extended the PPO term and lectured me harshly.
- Emily’s uncorroborated allegations again received more weight than objective records showing no criminal convictions or substantiated violence.
